? It all began in the trenches of the Somme, where soldiers sought solace amidst the horrors of war. One night, Private James Thompson stumbled upon an extraordinary discovery. He found a peculiar roll, unlike any toilet paper he had ever seen. ?

? News of this remarkable find spread like wildfire throughout the trenches. Suddenly, soldiers of all ranks were divided into two factions. On one side stood the "Overhandlers," those who believed the paper should hang over the front. On the other side, the "Underhandlers" backed the traditional method of hanging the paper behind. The stage was set for a battle of a different kind. ??

? July 15, 1916 - The first official debate took place in the mess hall. Generals, captains, and privates all gathered, ready to defend their preferred method. The Overhandlers argued that easy access and visibility were crucial, while the Underhandlers believed the back-hanging method provided cleaner handling. ??

? The debate escalated into a full-scale toilet paper war! Soldiers raided each other's latrines, hoarding rolls and swapping them with the opposite faction. Toilet paper barricades were built, and makeshift forts were fortified with the precious rolls, all while shells exploded above. The Battle of the Somme suddenly had a bizarre counterpart. ???

? August 5, 1916 - After weeks of heated discussions and countless rolls sacrificed, a truce was called. Soldiers on both sides realized that unity was essential in such dire times. The "Sideways Hang" was born, combining the visibility of the Overhandlers and the cleanliness of the Underhandlers. ??

? This compromise would go down in history as a testament to the resilience and adaptability of humanity. It was a small victory amidst the larger war, but it brought a sense of camaraderie to the trenches. The soldiers bonded over this shared experience, finding humor even in the darkest of times. ??
